About This Game

Concealed Intent is a simultaneous turn-based game of tactical space combat. Players control their ships in a fully 3D world - hunting down their enemies, just as they are being hunted themselves. In Concealed Intent you know your enemies are out there, but not exactly where, or even what they are.

To defeat your enemies you need to devise a range of strategies to gain enough information to successfully shoot at them. All the while they are trying to do the same to you.

Space is big and empty. Finding something can be like looking for a needle in a haystack, but there is nowhere for the needle to hide. To stay concealed a ship needs to fade into the background as much as possible. Everything a ship does will signal its presence and increase the ability of those nearby to detect it. A big ship may blot out stars as it passes. Heat from engines can be detected against the cold of the void. Lasers can be traced back to their origin. Eventually as detection increases, a firing solution can be calculated so that a beam of coherent light a few millimeters in diameter can cross thousands of kilometers to strike an evasive enemy - hidden no longer!

I'm only a few mission into the campaign but I can already tell that this game is super low quality. The interface could use a lot of polish, "ships" just turn on a dime 180 degrees no problems, story seem to be written a... Well to be fair in a recent review of another game I said 12 years old but in comparison to that game, we might as well just say that Concealed intent has no story whatsoever. I could just write a superior storyline in 5 minutes like I used to do in my D&D campaigns back in the day...

So no story, the gameplay is\u2665\u2665\u2665\u2665\u2665\u2665poor and super trivial... This is like a bad phone game ported to PC. I got it for two bucks in a sale and I still think I paid too much.

One big pro tho: no bugs or instability encountered so far. I guess I can at least say that about this game.
